press visit Friday 5 February 2021, 2 pm

A major figure on the Swedish art scene, Jockum Nordström has devoted over thirty years to his mischievous mix of worlds quotidian and oneiric, human and animal, abstract and naive, natural and architectural. At La Criée centre for contemporary art, he's presenting a selection of recent works: collages, drawings and cardboard sculptures.

WHEN WORLDS INTERSECT

Jockum Nordström is also an illustrator ofxchildren's books and a musician. His work is fuelled by references to popular and outsider art, jazz, Surrealism and architecture, in addition to Swedish culture and contemporary art. Out of all this emerge dreamlike fables in which different worlds and eras intermingle. The power of his work resides in the tension he sets up between simplicity of line and polyphony of subject matter.

Among his passions are architecture and a fascination with interiors and furniture going back to his childhood in the Stockholm suburbs, when the housing estates were being built. In his work architecture can be seen in both two and three dimensions. At La Criée he's showing a series of fragile geometrical sculptures, el cheapo residential blocks whose slender lines contradict the saddening clunkiness of their originals.

Nordström defies and defeats pigeonholing: in his case the «supposedly badly made» is very well made – and deliberately so. He emphasises the liberating force of an expressiveness that simultaneously plays on and shakes off the shackles of convention: his forms and characters spill out of the frame, his lines can be messy or wobbly, his paint runs intentional; there are unfinished bits, crude cuts, crooked folds. Plus a sense of composition made all the more striking by its sheer zaniness.

WHEN ABSTRACTION AND NARRATIVE COME TOGETHER

Jockum Nordström's commitment to forms and colours in their primal state is matched by his interest in narrative, whether real or imaginary. Here we have a storyteller moving back and forth between worlds, between characters and scenes, in a mingling of the childlike and the sexy, the contemporary and the timeless, the figurative and the abstract.

The collages on show are in earth colours: greens, dirty yellows, greys, diluted browns and faded blues, with touches here and there of darker, more saturated tones in the same range. The drawings illustrate the dexterity of someone who has been practising since he was a child.

Whirling, singing, enchanting: delightful in their clarity and liberty, Jockum Nordström's works are imbued with his trust in simplicity and the absolute necessity of the creative act.

Jockum Nordström creates oddball and apparently naïve narratives; his way of looking at life owes much to the twin influences of folk art and modernist absurdism. Each of his painted, drawn, or cut-up stories is both specific and open-ended, as though—not unlike Henry Darger's paintings—they are part of a much grander and ongoing tale that is going to take a long time to unfold. They are full of disjunctions, incongruities, and allusions, and in that respect they have some resemblance to unusually interesting dreams. The conventional logic of time and space is suspended, and the mood is often unheimlich, or uncanny. But there is always a lightness in his touch.

The sociologist Georg Simmel, writing in the early twentieth century, made some interesting remarks about the idea of "the stranger." Strangers, he said, inhabit a fragile but sinister universe. They collapse the boundaries between private and public, past and present, friends and enemies. Strangers, who are the personification of the liminal, serve to expose the fragility of either/or oppositions; they bring the outside into the inside, compromising the comfort of order with a threat of chaos. Nothing is natural any longer; the stranger is someone without qualities and rootless, like the unknown cowboy who rides into town to challenge the menfolk and attract the women. Strangers in small communities are often thought of as "easy riders," and when they're not ignored or run out of the city they're often considered to be very cool. There's much of the "stranger" in Nordstrom's work. His cardboard miniature buildings, for instance, as well as his dandyish musicians and undressed women, are a little uncanny.

Jockum Nordström crée des histoires excentriques apparemment naïves; sa vision de la vie doit beaucoup à la double influence de l'art populaire et de l'absurdité du monde moderne. Ses peintures, dessins et collages racontent tous des histoires à la fois précises et ouvertes, même si – un peu comme dans les tableaux de Henry Darger – elles s'inscrivent dans une intrigue beaucoup plus vaste et qui prendra du temps à se dénouer. Elles sont pleines de disjonctions, d'incongruités et d'allusions, et en ce sens ressemblent un peu à des rêves inhabituellement intéressants. Les logiques classiques du temps et de l'espace sont suspendues, et l'humeur est souvent unheimlich, ou troublante. Mais son trait est toujours empreint de légèreté.

Le sociologue Georg Simmel, au début du XXe siècle, a fait quelques remarques intéressantes sur la notion d'« étranger ». Les étrangers, disait-il, habitent un univers fragile mais sinistre. Ils font tomber les frontières entre privé et public, passé et présent, amis et ennemis. Les étrangers, qui sont la personnification du liminal, servent à exposer la fragilité des oppositions ou bien/ou bien : ils amènent l'extérieur vers l'intérieur, menacant d'introduire le chaos dans le confort de l'ordre. Plus rien n'est naturel ; l'étranger est sans qualités et sans racines, comme le cow-boy inconnu qui entre dans la ville pour défier les hommes et séduire les femmes. Dans les petites communautés, les étrangers sont souvent vus comme des « easy riders », et quand ils ne sont pas ignorés ou expulsés de la ville, ils sont souvent considérés comme très cool. On retrouve beaucoup de choses de l'« étranger » dans l'œuvre de Nordström. Par exemple, ses bâtiments miniatures en carton, ainsi que ses musiciens dandy et ses femmes dévêtues, suscitent une certaine « inquiétante étrangeté ».

CULTURE

Jockum Nordström Is the Rock Star of the Stockholm Art Scene

2017 looks like it will be a very good year for Swedish artist Jockum Nordström.

Maybe it's all the all the talk about "alternative facts," but the world seems especially surreal of late, which, combined with a trip to Stockholm Fashion Week, got me to thinking about the alternative universe created by Jockum Nordström. Nordström, a primarily visual artist, had his first show in 1988, and soon became one of Sweden's best-known creators, primarily for his drawings and collages, which are united by the way that they ask the viewer to suspend their disbelief. "Surreal" doesn't feel like the right way to describe these works, because their aesthetic borrows from folk and Outsider art, which gives them a surface naiveté, even though the content can occasionally be R-rated. His series of (appropriately rated) children's books—Sailor och Pekka, about a man and his dog—are comfortably considered classics in Scandinavia akin to Jean de Brunhoff's Babar.

2017 finds Nordström in can't-stop-won't stop mode, with a solo show in Antwerp, an exhibit at the Contemporary Arts Center in New Orleans, a soon to be installed commission for Skandinaviska Enskilda Banken (SEB) Bank, plus continued work on a book project in conjunction with the estate of Leo Tolstoy, and an upcoming album. Three days before Nordström and his band closed Stockholm Fashion Week with a performance at the Whyred after party, I sat down with the artist in his hometown to talk about his work.

Your work is comprised of so many techniques—how do you describe yourself? It's very hard to describe yourself, but I am of course, an artist, I can say it now, when I'm over 50. Pictures are absolutely [the foundation of my work]. Even if I make sculptures, I am still a man who makes pictures on paper.

I'm an artist from the beginning. I was always drawing and painting so it was very natural for me. I think I wanted to be other things first, maybe a carpenter, or sailor. I wanted to be a sailor when I was young, to see the world, but the only thing I could do was draw and paint. [Which I did] all the time. It was for me a way to be private. I created my own world in one way. I was [at it] every day. [If you work hard at it,] in the end you have your tools. [You know how] to draw and paint and you understand what kind of colors you like. And then of course you change it, but you have the confidence to use this when you create, and after a while [you create] a world. But you don't think about this by yourself, it just grows slowly, slowly,...like mold!

What is your process:

I have a lot—a lot—of books, a lot of records all over. When I make a collage, I cut first. I'm always cutting, and cutting for me is relaxing. I started with this maybe 25 years ago. You cut, and then you paint, and if a [piece] is not the right shape, you cut a little more; take off the head, make a new head. There's a lot of freedom, it's playful.

I really like the process when you make collages because it's different floors: I start to cut and I cut until I am a bit tired. After three weeks or something I have a lot of cutouts and then I start to paint on them, maybe for two weeks or so. When I paint them sometimes I think this isn't a good color, and I can paint the other side. If it's really bad after that, I put it under the water and let them dry and the next day I go on, one more time. It's like you go from details to a picture. If you are a classical painter—I was from the beginning, but I had such bad allergies that I stopped using oils—you start with a picture, with a composition, and go down to the details. [With my collages] it is a totally different thing. I start with all these details, and then draw on them, take some more week, and then take them out. Then I maybe work just with backgrounds, abstract backgrounds. A lot of these are really bad, you know, they're shit, but I can't leave them. I go down and try to make them good, put them on the other way, and sometimes I can use pieces of them. [By the time I'm ready to make] a picture I have a late of materials.

And how would you describe your approach?

I think you have two different bases as an artist; you have nature and you have relationships: human beings, architecture, cities [with] all the people together. Nature is something else. It's the light and trees, the animals. [When you make art] you have to put in your [own] psyche; you have to do something from your own. And if you work with relationships—films are almost always about relationships—you have to put your psyche in that too.

I grew up in a city, in the suburbs, so when I was younger, [my art was very much about] my life with all these relationships: love, hate, school, upbringing, building house, break down things. The scenography was always the city in one way, but I think I always have been very, very interested, down deep, in the nature. [It's] the stars and the ocean, the animals the sounds—everything. Somewhere without words. I love that.

What is the role of narrative in your work?

I have a narrative in my head, always. It's about my life, of course, and abstract thinking, too. Sometimes the abstract thinking takes over, and sometimes the narrative takes over. Narrative is very close to drivel because if you are too narrative, too pathetic, too emotional, [you basically say], "Here it is, take it," [and] destroy [the reason] for people to look at it. I really love to work with this [balance,] which is really hard [to achieve]. It's like a man walking a tight rope, and falling off. Then you try one more time. I like that feeling, I always like feeling that this is close to shit.

How do you feel about your art being compared to "outsider art?"

I think art is something that is not so related to your personality because you are going to die and the art will still go on. It's like nature, it's not so much about text. I think art is visual, but if you want to do something, [make your mark], I think you have to be personal, to have your [own] voice. And voice is not so much about ego, it's more about feelings, what you have to give to something. For me, if you're an educated artist or an outsider, if you have this voice, you try to make something special. For me, it's

Some of the best artists are outsiders; I think it's the same in music too. Of course I like the educated world, with all these intellectual things; it's very important, maybe the most important, but sometimes it can be very, very dry and destructive. I like artists like James Castle, who was deaf, and Henry Darger. For me it's crazy that you [draw a border between this and capital-A Art.] for this. Outsider art, if it's good, is like educated art. I have never made a border about this, even when I was young. If it had good colors, good feeling, I was very interested in it, I saw it like a special thing with its own language.

And what about folk art?

I'm from the suburbs, where there are people from a lot of places. I've always been very interested in folk art style since I was young, and I am still. The United States is very strong in folk art because it's a young place with people from all over. I think [these people] took their culture with them when they came to America, so it's very rich the folk art from the U.S. from 200 years ago. I have been looking at that, but I have also been looking a lot at German folk art, and Italian, Swedish, Lappish, Indian things. I mix everything.

How did your children's book series come to be?

When we were a young couple, me and Karin [Jockum's partner, also an artist, known as "Mamma" Andersson] sketched a boy and a dog for a children's book. We made a lot of pictures but it ran out in one way, we were working with our paintings all the time. And then I [fell into a] depression; I was very tired of working with paintings and I started to make this children's book one more time by myself. It was very good for my depression because I had a good time [making it]. In four months everything was done, it was like therapy.

I was young at the time that I started with [the books], and my children were small; now they are 26 and 29. They are big men. When they were small, the main thing with picture books, for me, was the pictures, the feeling of the environment, and the characters, and in some of the children's books [we had] there was so much text, blah blah blah blah blah, and it was so boring sometimes, so I made these more special. The dog can be me sometimes, or he can be the children; and Sailor is me or Karin, the adult world.

The words—I have made five books—always come in the last minute. It's the last thing I do and that's the reason why I like them, because I've built them up from a kind of simple story. I write down a lot of notes on small sheets and I have them in a box. In the end, when everything is done, I look at all these notes and start to make the words, and I want to make them very simple. Sometimes you have very tiny places to put the words in, so I have to cut [the text] down, and I think that's good for the rhythm.

The first three books I made in two years or something, it was close together. My children were small at that time, it was easy to do. When I made my fourth book, it was hard to do because my children were bigger and I had no help from them or their friends. But I did it, and I was happy for that. After I made four books, [I felt unhappy about the number]; three or five is much more beautiful in a way, it's more like a family, so I decided to make one more.

Can you talk about some of your upcoming projects, like the show in New Orleans?

[Regarding the show at the Contemporary Arts Center,] the curator, her name is Andrea Andersson, wanted to have things related to New Orleans, to the music. I had a big show in Lille in 2013 that was a retrospective, maybe from 2000 to today. I didn't want to make the same, so I have an idea to have a lot of recent things, from maybe the last two years, if we can borrow them, and then earlier things. I think it could be good to take out the ten or 15 years between, so you have different feelings. I really want to have some graphite drawings too from the beginning [of my career]. For me, they are about growing up, sexuality, the cities. Today my work is much, much more about

I also have a solo show that is quite big in Antwerp in November. I want to make new stuff [for that].

I think I want to make a new children's book, like Vart ska du? because I have been writing a lot the last year. Not from the beginning to make a book, more [just] writing. I think I can use words and rhymes from that to make a book.

And then I work with Leo Tolstoy. His grandchildren's children contacted me. They have found fables that haven't [or rarely] been seen, and they have the rights on these and they want me to [illustrate] them. I've been working a lot with this the last year, and I'm going to show them in one month what I have done. Sometimes they are simple things, but they have a very good feeling. It's [a work] in progress; if it fails, it fails, but for me it's really, really happy.

I think Tolstoy wrote these for orphans. They are for educating small children, small stories about simple psychological things, and to learn teach [children] about the spider, how they make their webs, and how tree grow, and things like that.

And what about music? Isn't that something that you're also involved with?

I play in a band, Joakim Åhlund & Jockum Nordström, and we're coming out with the second album now. Playing music is really good for me now, I played when I was younger, of course. I play guitar and base. The first record's name is "The Toad and the Dog," the second is called "The Son of Dracula." I think it's hard to say if its rock or jazz; it's something else. Sometimes it's more like theater or film music, and sometimes it's more blues.

Lili, the Rozell and the Marimba

Over two seasons beginning in September 2019 La Criée centre for contemporary art will be presenting a cycle of exhibitions, events, research projects and encounters revolving around the vernacular and its relationship with contemporary art.

The adjective "vernacular" – from the Latin vernaculus, "native" or "domestic" – is generally used to describe what comes from a particular country or region, with specific local ("endemic", we might say) characteristics: we speak of vernacular languages or names or architecture and so on. The vernacular always has roots somewhere. It has to do with the spirit of place.

The vernacular, though, is not bound by rigid tradition. Its creations may be underpinned by "immutable" features of their place of origin – geography, climate, age-old traditions – but they are also shaped by local changes due to new uses, people passing through, migration flows, globalisation and so on. In this sense they are powerful forces for assimilation. Spirit of place, yes, but of a place that is receptive.

The cycle's title reflects this blend of roots and receptivity – of the creole and the archipelagic, to borrow from the philosopher and poet Édouard Glissant. The rozell is a Breton cooking utensil and the marimba an African musical instrument also widely used in Latin America. Lili is a nickname with all sorts of overtones.

The cycle Lili, the Rozell and the Marimba is an opportunity to put a series of questions regarding points of contact between vernacular and contemporary art, notably:

- What forms do the many inputs and influences between "contemporary" and "traditional" arts (doing and making, craft, folk and popular art, outsider art, naive art, etc.) between modernity and tradition, local and global take in the art of today?
- What (new?) ways of working are artists coming up with in "local" contexts?
- How are artists contributing to a rethinking of the connections between popular and scholarly knowledge, local and global, indigenous and foreign, etc?

The cycle also reflects La Criée's ongoing interest in narrative:

- How do personal narratives function as vehicles for history?
- Do we have the right to speak about a history that is not our own? What is our initial context? How are we to express ourselves?
